The article offers a detailed investigation into recent (since 2000) United States cases involving religious family agreements. In particular, the article focuses on attempts to enforce (1) Islamic mahr agreements; (2) provisions of Jewish ketubot; and (3) terms in premarital and separation agreements. Reviewing dozens of cases across a wide range of state trial and appellate courts, the article evaluates how courts have responded to the intricate family law issues and federal constitutional concerns raised by these cases.
